In a statement Thursday, Blatter said he had a "constructive" meeting with Domenico Scala to establish a framework for action and a timetable. He said he wants a comprehensive reform program and is aware that only FIFA's congress can pass such reforms.

Blatter met with Scala two days after announcing his resignation as FIFA's president and admitting the embattled organization needs a "profound restructuring."

Blatter, who was elected to a fifth term last week, says he intends to stay on to lead FIFA until a new president is elected sometime between December 2015 and March 2016.

In other news, former FIFA vice president Jack Warner said he has proof of financial dealings involving the organization's governing body and the 2010 general elections in his home country, Trinidad and Tobago.

Warner, who has been charged in the FIFA corruption scandal, said in a televised address late Wednesday he has documents and checks that link FIFA with the Caribbean island-nation's 2010 election.
